Chapter 1 by EvilDisney

A young woman sits alone on a train. As she begins to fall asleep she wakes herself up and remembers her mission and how long she has been waiting to complete it. The woman shifts slightly, exposing the tip of a blade that she had been hiding in her long black jacket. As the woman is putting her blade back into place the train stops, leaving the sound of the old train's wheels straining against the weight of the train. The woman leaves the train and continues on her journey, not seeing the man that had followed her.

Chapter 2 by R

As she walks down the lonely, dark alleys, she can hear the footsteps. She continues to walk, and listens, waiting for them to turn away. She has made a mistake, but her follower has made one as well.

She continues to walk and ever so carefully grabs the sword she has been concealing in the coat. She turns around to stare at him, her sword rushing to his neck, when she realizes his is drawn and pointing at her heart.

“Ah, it’s you,” she mutters, staring at his familiar face. “It’s been a while, Evan.”

He grins at her, unflinching. “So it’s you, the one with the sword.”

She doesn’t move. His face

"You first." She says, careful. He doesn't move either.

"You've grown sloppy." He tells her, still smiling. His eyes don't look as tired as they used to, back then.

"So have you." She informs him. "You need to pick your targets better." Her eyes are tired, and she looks older. What has driven her to this?

They stand at an impasse on the narrow street, until finally she lowers her blade. She knows he would never be the first to move, not with her sword at his neck.

Two weapons both go back in to hidden spots in coats. The pair stand there, staring. It has been a long time. Most all of the others are dead now, those like Duncan who put to much of a value on honor.

It's been a while, and neither is certain where to go from here.
